Further details

A spell of very strong winds will affect western Scotland during Monday night and into Tuesday morning.

Gusts of 65 mph are likely, with the potential for 70-80 mph gusts in a few of the more exposed places in the Western Isles.

The swathe of stronger winds will move southwards overnight, with winds then easing from the north.

Reason for update

The low pressure system that brings the strongest winds is now expected to be much slower arriving into north-west Scotland, so despite a windy day on Monday the potential for impacts is less until later in the evening and restricted to western parts.

Very low likelihood of medium impacts
